The two views I created are pages that will very likely have the highest traffic (the file creation page and the working canvas), and therefore are critical to be aesthetically pleasing, and simple to use. In my attempt to keep things simple and minimalistic, per the user feedback my group received, I feel that the design elements are lacking, specifically in the colour scheme and layout.

I had trouble figuring out the proper way to use colours from our palette, even after consulting other websites and viewing other individuals' designs. My goal is to create a website that doesn't feel generic, but provides an exciting colour layout and design. In selecting the colour for the file creation and upload buttons, I chose green since this is usually conveyed as a positive colour and could give an overall well-pleasing view to this part of the page. In introspection, I find this acceptable but rather unorthodox when comparing with what buttons usually look like. We only have 5 colours selected currently, which might be limiting if we were to continue working on this app.

With regard to the layout, combining enough features for editing while keeping a minimalist style was troubling for me. I tried to give enough space for the 'canvas' while keeping the toolbox and list of currently editing users properly spaced. Without copying Google Docs or Notion, I had trouble creating something unique with regard to the layout.
